POSTCARD FROM A JUNIOR

Dylan Denny

Passing on your legacy

Legacy: what does it mean to you? To me, it means being dedicated to your craft so that you can pass it on and be remembered for it. For others, it might mean leaving something for their children or passing down family values.

No matter what you do in life, you should always leave a legacy of some sort. For us cattle producers, that usually means continuing the legacy of the family cattle operation. It is a special thing when you get to take over the family operation. I am a first-generation black Angus producer. I have the unique opportunity to create the legacy of Denny Cattle Company with my family so that I can hopefully pass it down to my children one day.

Building this legacy has been no easy task, as is true of all cattle operations. Raising cattle is not a simple feat as you work long days, deal with hardships and are always at the mercy of mother nature. It is a job most people don't want. Not for us Angus producers though. At a young age we are instilled with a strong work ethic, responsibility and appreciation for cattle. We realize that we are in the 2% of people who are involved in agriculture who must feed the world.

While most shy away, we embrace the challenge to reach new heights that have yet to be discovered. We are feeding more with less. We are being scrutinized more than ever, yet we are still here. We are taught to carry on the legacy of hard-working agriculturalists. That is what makes building a legacy and passing one on so special. You know that you are setting someone else up with a greater chance of success than what you had while still keeping it in the family.
