

GENETIC DEFECTS & FACTORS

Genetic defects occur in all breeds of all species. The following is not published to imply the Angus breed has serious problems with them. It doesn't. Nor is it published to imply Angus cattle are susceptible to more defects than are other breeds. They aren't. Rather, the information is published in keeping with the American Angus Association's open policy, a policy intended to provide information to people who raise cattle.

Please note that, in addition to reported carriers of genetic defects or genetic factors, there is also a list of those animals who, through progeny testing (which results in 99% accuracy), have been determined free of the named defects.

As other animals are added to any of these categories, they will be listed in the Angus Journal column "Breeders' Reference."

REPORTED CARRIERS

This is a list of Angus bulls and cows that have been reported to the American Angus Association by their owners as having sired or produced calves with one or more of the six genetic defects or factors being monitored by the Association.

It is not a list of all Angus that are carriers of genetic defects or genetic factors. Only cases that are reported to the Association by the owner or owners of the animal (or are verified by a veterinarian) at the time the defect or factor was discovered are listed.

If a registered Angus bull is known to have sired a calf with one of the six defects or factors, this information is required on the application for AI service certificates and is then printed on all certificates issued for that bull.

The defects are divided into two classes, Class I and Class II.

The asterisk (*) before an individual listing indicates the certificate of registration has been cancelled.

Class I Defects

Class I defects include dwarfism, osteopetrosis (marble bone disease), double muscling and syndactyly (mule foot). These defects are lethal or seriously disabling, or they seriously affect reproductive performance.

Class II Defects

Heterochromia irides (white eye) is the only Class II genetic defect now monitored by the American Angus Association. Although affected calves have abnormal skin and eye pigmentation, the disease is not known to affect the reproduction, growth or beef-producing ability of an animal. The animals, however, are extremely light sensitive, which makes the eye pupils always constricted in daylight, giving the eyes their "slitlike" appearance.

Cows that have produced affected calves are not included in this listing, and affected calves are ineligible for registration by the American Angus Association.

Genetic Factors

Red color is the single genetic factor monitored by the American Angus Association. It is monitored because it is caused by a simple recessive gene and because red calves are not eligible for registration under the rules of the American Angus Association.

This makes red calves an economic liability to some registered breeders, and some commercial cattlemen would rather not have red calves in their herds. On the other hand, red color has no effect on the reproduction, growth or beef-producing ability of an animal. Breeders are divided in their opinion of the seriousness of the red color gene in Angus cattle.

REPORTED FREE

Following is a list of bulls and cows that have been progeny-tested under the guidelines of the American Angus Association and found to be free of the following genetic defects or genetic factors.

The asterisk (*) before an individual number indicates the animal is dead or is no longer being used in a registered herd.

The following abbreviations appear on pedigrees of animals progeny-tested under the Association guidelines.

- GDF—Tested free of all defects
- FS—Tested free of syndactyly
- FH—Tested free of double muscling
- FHG—Tested free of horn gene
- FD—Tested free of dwarfism

- FM—Tested free of marble bone disease
- FR—Tested free of red
- RFD—Carrier of red gene but tested free of dwarfism
- RFS—Carrier of red gene but tested free of syndactyly
- FX—Tested free of multiple defects (contact Association)

Tested free of all genetic defects and genetic factors monitored by the Association
