The American Angus Association and its members have gone through many changes in the last 25 years. Various sizes of Angus operations are represented by the membership.

“We often hear how small-scale producers are insignificant and they do not matter,” says Jerry Cassady,

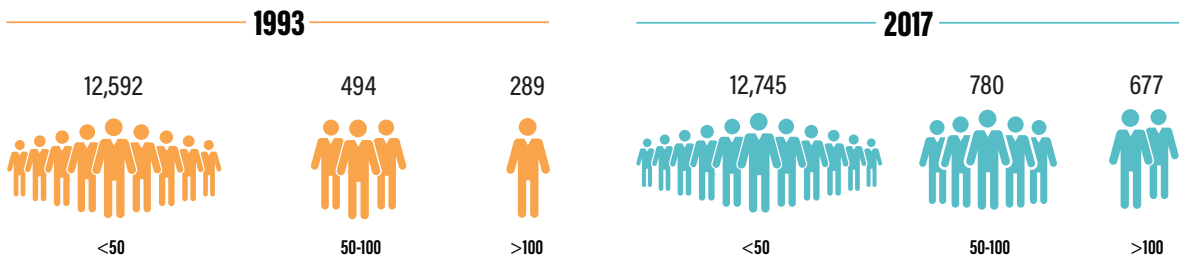

American Angus Association director of member services. “As you can clearly see, the vast majority of our membership is made up of small-scale producers. As an organization, we could not function like we do today without all members, regardless of herd size.”

Though numbers have fluctuated with the economy and industry trends, what holds true year after year is the intrinsic value and viability of the Angus breed for any size operation. AJ
