

AUXILIARY NOTES

by Pam Velisek, President, American Angus Auxiliary

Quality Counts

Quality counts. We all know the catchphrase, but what does quality mean to us as Angus breeders?

Webster defines it as “degree of excellence” and “superior in kind.” Achieving that seems simple when we have the Angus cow and bull, doesn’t it? Yet, even though they are the most influential genetics in the national herd, we still must back them up with service and information. Angus is regarded as a very hardy breed, that is adaptable to environment, producing quality beef. We as producers also need to be adaptable and hold ourselves to higher standards and bringing quality to the consumer. This creates trust between the breeders, producers and, in the end, the customers.

Achieving this isn’t something we do individually. We need an organization that knows how to use its resources and has excellent communication; you might say a “quality organization.”

The American Angus Association takes quality into account with every facet they offer. From expected progeny difference (EPD) search information, regional managers and sales reports to events that get the best producers in the country together to share knowledge and information to tackle anything that comes our way.

What makes a quality organization? People: whether leaders, employees, volunteers or members. It’s the people in our breed that make it “quality.” One branch of this Association I am proud to be a part of is the American Angus Auxiliary. The Auxiliary creates opportunities with the Association for the youth of our industry — from Miss American Angus to awards for outstanding work to scholarships. All are important to ensuring not only a quality for our future as a breed association, but to ensuring we have quality human beings running it with work ethic, trustworthiness and empathy.

Each and every Angus event I attend, it’s the people I meet and work with that impress me and make me proud to be involved in this breed and the American Angus Auxiliary. Quality people count, and we have an abundance of them!

The Future of Antibiotic Use

More scrutiny for antibiotics given to groups of cattle.

by Troy Smith, field editor

There once were just four things to consider when contemplating treatment of an animal with an antibiotic, said Kansas State University veterinarian Mike Apley. The first was whether it was likely to do any good. The second consideration was whether it might do any harm. Thirdly, a person had to figure out the best way to get the product into the animal. The fourth thing to consider was the cost.

“Now there are five things,” Apley explained to stakeholders gathered for the 2021 Cattle Industry Convention in Nashville, Tenn. “Now we have to think about whether the treatment will do something to increase antibiotic resistance.”

A member of the Presidential Advisory Council on Combating Antibiotic-Resistant Bacteria, Apley was invited to address the National Cattlemen’s Beef Association (NCBA) Cattle Health and Well-Being Committee and talk about the future role of antibiotics in livestock production.

Cattle producers will have to become more discerning about antibiotic use, he warned. Many classes of antibiotics used to treat livestock are also used in human medicine, and antibiotic resistance among organisms that cause human disease is a legitimate concern.

“If a producer asks how is he causing a problem by treating a cow for foot rot or anaplasmosis, the answer is ‘You’re not,’” Apley said. “The questions come about when antibiotics are used repeatedly in a population. We’re held to a higher standard when applying treatment to groups.”

Apley said more scrutiny can be expected when antibiotics are applied to groups of cattle for prevention and control of infections. Expect increased criticism of metaphylactic measures.

“Tylosin and CTC (chlortetracycline) in feed are the lightning rods,” he said.

The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) is considering requiring language specifying duration of use to be included on product labels, Apley said. A veterinarian prescription requirement for the purchase of injectable penicillin and oxytetracycline products is likely by 2023.

Apley also told cattlemen to expect advocate groups to push for state reporting requirements for veterinary prescriptions. Eventually, producers may have to pass scrutiny for antibiotic use, before gaining access to certain cattle or beef markets. Under reporting requirements, cattle that require a lot of doctoring with antibiotics could have lower value.

Practice unwavering antibiotic stewardship, Apley advised, by first doing everything possible to avoid using them and then only using antibiotics correctly. He noted that no new classes of antibiotics have been approved for use in animals since 1978, and producers should not expect any new classes to be released in the future. If new ones are added for use in humans, it’s likely they will be held in reserve and not shared with animals.

“We have to be really, really good stewards of what we have,” Apley warned.
