

Don't Come Empty-Handed

Entries at the NWSS aren't complete until regional managers have given their stamp of approval.

Story & photos by Corinne Blender

You sent in your entries before the entry deadline. You may have even traveled hundreds or thousands of miles, stopping for several tanks of diesel fuel, to get to the show. But it won't be worth the effort in the end if you show up at the National Western Stock Show (NWSS) with little more than a lead rope in hand.

It's easy to get caught up in the rush to set up stalls on the "Hill" or to set up herd bull displays in the "Yards." But to participate in show events such as the NWSS in Denver, Colo., there are a few extra steps a breeder must take upon arrival to complete his or her entry.

The special time set aside for this is called "check-in." If you haven't seen your regional manager since you rolled into town, he'll be waiting for you to bring your animal, along with its official registration papers, to the check-in area. There, Association representatives will collect specific data for the event and finalize your entry.

On the Hill

The different classes of show cattle can make check-in seem like a circus in progress while tattoos are being checked against registration papers on the Hill. If you have your prized animal in tow, be prepared to wait for a few extra measurements.

Regional managers will assist in the measurement of rib and rump fat on the heifers. This information is provided to the judges while they are in the showing, picking class winners and champions. Checkers will also take these measurements, as well as scrotal circumference, on show bulls while their tattoos are being checked.

Sale bulls must be tagged and their scrotal circumferences measured at the time of entry. Rib fat and rump fat measurements are also taken, as well as hip heights to determine frame score.

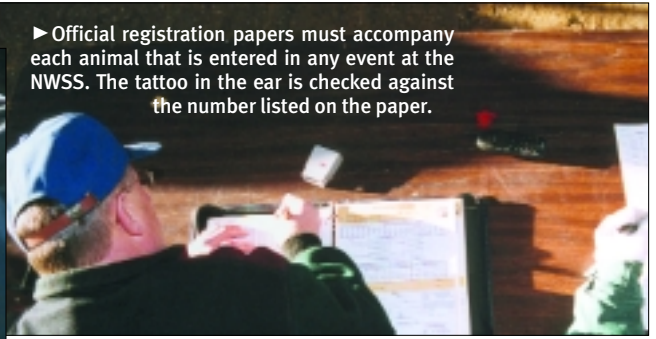

All this information is entered electronically with a little help from the American Angus Association's Angus

► It's a busy time when cattle are brought through check-in at the National Western Stock Show. Regional managers and ultrasound technicians collect data and make sure entries are properly identified.

► Official registration papers must accompany each animal that is entered in any event at the NWSS. The tattoo in the ear is checked against the number listed on the paper.

Information Management Software (AIMS) Department.

The cattle aren't weighed at time of check-in. They are weighed prior to entering the showing. Exhibitors must allow time to bring their entries to the makeup area to be weighed before their class is called into the ring.

In the Yards

Bulls line alley after alley, waiting to be checked in for the pen and carload shows in the Yards. An assembly line of regional managers and ultrasound technicians work between two chutes that are set up to check tattoos against registration papers.

Rib fat and rump fat measurements are captured by ultrasound. Scrotal circumference measurements are taken and entered into the logbook to be given to the judges for review while the contest is in progress.

Both carloads and pens are weighed just before entering the ring on the day of the competition.

► Above: A certified ultrasound technician is on hand at the NWSS to measure rump and rib fat on cattle entries on the Hill and in the Yards. Judges can use this information to help make their placings.

► All bulls entered on the Hill or in the Yards will be measured for scrotal circumference.

Avoid problems

Check-in is a busy time for breeders and Angus employees alike. A few extra steps can be taken at home to make this process run smoothly:

- (1) Make sure the tattoo number on your animal's registration paper matches the tattoo in the animal's ear.
- (2) Bring official registration papers to the event check-in. Photocopied papers are not permitted.
- (3) Make certain that transfers are made before the entry deadline, or animals will be disqualified.

The animal is officially entered once a regional manager certifies the animal's registration paper with the stamp of approval and event date.

► The final step in the check-in process is complete when a regional manager stamps an animal's registration paper with the show and date.
