Keep food supply secure

Have you ever questioned the food that you eat? Have you ever wondered how that food was produced; how it was prepared; how it was handled? It seems as though the food system of the United States is something that has been taken advantage of. Many citizens take their food supply for granted.

Taken for granted

Wherever you look, there is food. Regardless of the time of day or location, food is one of the easiest things to obtain. Compared to those in other countries,

Garrett Knebel

Americans spend the lowest percentage of their annual disposable income on food. America's food system sustains life, helps us grow, defines our culture, and is a part of almost every family's holidays and celebrations.

Food is a dominant piece of every person's culture; however, sustaining and protecting our food supply is something that is now becoming more important than ever.

Even though most don't think about the entire process of taking food from source to plate, our food supply goes through a very intricate and in-depth process. America's food supply starts with farm and input suppliers; is transported, stored, processed and distributed; placed into retail, grocery or restaurants; and then consumed by the individual. As you can see, the U.S. food supply is affected by many, and the opportunity for mistake is large. Our food system is vital to sustain life, and we often take it for granted.

Perhaps the biggest threat to our food system is associated with food safety. Our biggest concern happens to be preventing the risk of foodborne illness. Food safety includes protecting the food supply from microbial, chemical, and physical hazards or contamination that may occur during all stages of food production and handling — growing, harvesting, processing, transporting, preparing, distributing and storing.

According to Paul Mead, foodborne diseases are estimated to cause 76 million illnesses, 325,000 hospitalizations, and 5,000 deaths annually in the United States. The most common causes of foodborne illness, listed in decreasing prevalence, are: salmonella, listeria, toxoplasmosis and E. coli. The most common idea of foodborne illness is associated with E. coli, however, E. coli cases only account for 3% of all foodborne illness cases.

Unfortunately, most foodborne illnesses have to do with the preparation of the food; meaning most cases are self-inflicted. The disastrous impact to the agriculture industry is that consumers blame the producer for these problems instead of themselves. They think the problem originated from the food, instead of the way the product was prepared.

Our food system represents the most efficient, cost-effective and dependable market in the world. The food the American public eats, and the occasions and special holidays during which that food is consumed, have become symbolic to the citizens of the United States. It has a massive economic impact on our economy. An attack on our food system could cause major public health concern. It could be used as a tool to instill fear and panic into the population.

One example of an attack on our food system occurred in January 2005. It involved an angry grocery employee in Michigan. He injected some ground beef with insecticide. It affected nearly 250 pounds (lb.) of ground beef and caused 148 consumers to become ill.

Furthermore, an unknown suspect contaminated some cattle feed in Wisconsin. Four million pounds of feed had to be recalled and destroyed. Its impact had a total cost of around $250 million dollars. The culprit still has not been found; however, after further analysis, chlordane was found to be the contaminant.

It's obvious the U.S. population would not be able to survive without food. There's no question, we tend to take our food supply system for granted, and it is always imperative that we appreciate from where our food comes.

It's almost unnerving to think about how easy it would be for a terrorist to contaminate our food supply, and if done with something truly toxic, the vast amount of the population could be affected. The U.S. food system is enormous and happens to affect everyone or thing that tries to survive in this world. Keeping the food supply safe and constant is an enormous task the world will have to deal with for the centuries to come.
